Mr. Brown will speak about the original old growth forests of northern Minnesota, including the power they held in the landscape and their influence on the indigenous people. These forests attracted rapacious logging and mining at a time of extraordinary expansion in the United States. A new world grew from the stumps and slash piles of that era. This period changed the forests and the people who lived in them, not always for the better, but often for good. Discover how we can learn from the changes people endured, because they will happen again.

Aaron J. Brown is an author, contributing columnist for the Minnesota Star Tribune, and instructor at Minnesota North College in Hibbing.
